Mrs. Cave's Interpretation of "The Shining Hour"

Mrs. Sally Bullock Cave, wearing a brown chiffon evening kown with a short train and with pleating over the shoulders and around the bottom of the skirt, and a necklace of carved amber, yesterday afternoon presented to her patrons the second of her series of dramatic interpretations, at the Lexington College of Music.

Mrs. Cave's selection for yesterday afternoon, "The Shining Hour" by Keith Winter, was given in her usual thorough and interesting manner.

She said "The Shining Hour" by Keith Winter opens to us the doors of a farmhouse in Yorkshire, the ancestral home of the Lindens. We look in upon a scene of wont and custom common enough to English eeys, but to ours, long used to the habit of the American farm—this zestful and tart picture of family life in Yorkshire seems as foreign as though it were drawn from the antipodes. The only thing that likens it to us is the language, and even that is nearest to us in print.

"To Americans such a function as high tea although less fastidious seems little less exotic than the tea ceremonial of Japan. Prying and curious as our manner is, we enjoy looking in on the English, with perhaps a little twinge of envy that we should have effaced from our lives and hearts their unwritten code of tradition. Only an ocean and a wilderness could have wiped out the memory of such a household rite as high tea.

"Knowing that it was once our cherished custom we shall look in on it today through the light of a long perspective, a little wistfully.

"Henry Linden, the oldest brother, has been in India for many years. He has made a fortune and has come home to spend it. He has also married a second wife, young and beautiful and has brought her from the Orient to England as the immediate jewel of his middle age. The curtain rises upon the evening of the homecoming of Henry Linden and Mariella, his wife.

"They have just reached the family farm house where they will sojurn as in a land of promise until their new home is finished several miles away. The girl 's only half English; her mother was of Dutch birth and her own life has been spent in India. England, its customs, its people, seem strange to her; and her beauty and faintly exotic charm disturb from the first moment and vaguely trouble the solidarity and restraint of the family group.

"The play deals with the ancient problem of a great love and its exactions. It poses the hoary question: Shall a supreme passion, by virtue of its rarity, by reason of its power, take account of the petty moralities men have forged to bind it? Being a sidereal, a planetary thing, can it take thought of human hea ts thta break of casual moths that are crushed in its path to fulfillment?

"When Judy finds that the husband she adores and who has never loved her deeply, has found, at last, life's meaning in the witchlike eyes of his brother's wife, she knows that she must step aside or meet a moth's fate. In taking the shortest way to self effacement and sacrifice, Judy fails to calculate the full effect of her deed; the burden of imputed guilt, of retributive blame—th curse of blood which her act will lay at the door of David and Mariella.

"A suicide in such circumstances may be the most pitiless act of requital. It may call down on the heads of the living as implicit death wish, and deliver them to cold judgments of the world. Although Judy's intent was to bless, not to harm, such a deed as hers sends it roots deep into mosmic implications, impenetrable and unguessed. How Mariella and David meet their fate at this supreme moment of decision forms the denouement of the play.

"Mr. Winter has offered us some unobtrusive symbolism in presenting the detail of his action: the crossword puzzle which Judy leaves for Mariella to finish. Henry's house which does not rise beyond the foundations, the game of bezique which allows no sequences, point to matters of graver moment.

"Mr. Elmer Rice and Mr. Sean O'Casey have lately seen fit to unpack their hearts with bitter words for such plays as "The Shining Hour" and "Another Language." Such triviality is not for the theater they think. The drama should be made of sterner stuff, says Mr. Rice —a forum for ideas, a tribune of the people is the mission of the theater. Mr. O'Casey says that its mission is to present art forms of poetry and dance, free and Elizabethan. But where are the playwrights in the grand manner to be found? Both Mr. Rice and Mr. O'Casey do better work when they stay closer to the shores of familiar things than when they venture into the mists of poetry or the deep sea paths of tragedy —and our theater would be very bleak in the intervals which must space the appearing of poetry and tragedy in the great art forms. It is sad that the commercial theater confines itself to mere amusement; but perhaps when the great voice is uttered it will make itself heard as it has always done in times past.

"Meanwhile the uninspired will turn to account familiar scenes and lives—and if they cannot be master builders of drama they can fashion homes of humbler quality which the theater has never been ashamed to own."
